Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: .atom, which has quite different chemical and physical properties from those of the parent. Professor Rutherford has described these radio-active transformations. He is able to trace the successive degradation of the radium atom through at least six diverse stages, each produced by a loss of a definite number of electrons, until at length, as he believes, it ends as an atom of lead--one of the commonest and least active of metals. This is very different from the alchemist's dream of the transmutation of lead into gold, but it is at least as epoch-making a discovery. Only those who have studied the matter closely can appreciate the wonderful triumphs of manipulation and reasoning which have thus enabled our physicists to get inside the atom, and trace the motions of the infinitely small electrons which compose it. We are on the threshold of a complete revolution in our ideas as to the constitution of matter.-- The Spectator (London). NOTES ON SCIENCE AND ENGINEERING From All Sources Concrete made of broken or crushed brick instead of stone gives excellent results for some purposes; but it always requires a larger proportion of cement than when less porous material is used. On the whole, with low-grade ores and dilute solutions of potassium cyanide, the cyanide solution itself will, if properly aerated, carry oxygen enough to dissolve the gold; so that artificial oxydizers are seldom needed, unless there is some reducing agent present in the water or the ore which will...
